

(1958) 12 SC CK 0021
In the Supreme Court Of India
Case No : Appeal (civil) 426 of 1958

D.S. Garewal

APPELLANT

Vs

The State of Punjab and Another

RESPONDENT

Date of Decision : 11-12-1958

Acts Referred:

Constitution of India, 1950 — Article 226, 312, 392

Citation : AIR 1959 SC 512 : (1959) 1 SCR 792 Supp

Hon'ble Judges : Sudhi Ranjan Das, C.J.; S. K. Das, J.; P. B. Gajendragadkar, J.; M. Hidayatullah, J.; K. N. Wanchoo, J

Bench : Full Bench

Final Decision : Dismissed

Judgement

Wanchoo, J.—This appeal by special leave raises the question of the constitutionality of the All-India Services Act, (LXI of 1951) (hereinafter called the Act). The appellant was appointed to the Indian Police Service on October 1, 1949, and posted to the State of Punjab. He held charge as Superintendent of Police in various districts but was reverted as Assistant Superintendent of Police in August 1957, and was eventually posted to Dharamsala in March 1958. In the same month he was informed that it was proposed to take action against him under rule 5 of the All-India Services (Discipline and Appeal) Rules, 1955, (hereinafter called the Rules), framed u/s 3 of the Act. He was thereafter placed under suspension under rule 7 of the Rules pending disciplinary proceedings against him, and Shri K. L. Bhudiraja I.A.S. was appointed enquiry officer to hold the departmental enquiry against him. Notice was issued to him by the Enquiry Officer in July 1958. He thereupon immediately made an application under Article 226 of the Constitution before the Punjab High Court challenging the constitutionality of the Act and the legality of the enquiry against him. The application was dismissed on July 30, 1958, and his application for a certificate to appeal to this Court was dismissed next day. Thereupon he came to this Court and was granted special leave.

2. Shri Chatterjee appearing for the appellant has raised the following six points in support of the appeal :-

(1) The amendment made by the President in Article 312 of the Constitution by virtue of his power under Article 392 by the Constitution (Removal of Difficulties) Order No. II of 26th January, 1950, was in excess of the power conferred on him under Article 392;

(2) It was not within the competence of the provisional Parliament to enact the Act in 1951, as there was no compliance with the condition precedent to such an Act being passed under Article 312;

(3) The Rules when promulgated in 1955 were bad as they were repugnant to Article 312 as the amendment made by the President by the Constitution (Removal of Difficulties) Order No. II had ceased to have force and Article 312 stood in 1955 as originally enacted in the Constitution;

(4) Article 312 laid a mandate on Parliament to make a law regulating the recruitment and conditions of service of all-India services created under that Article and Parliament could not delegate this function to the Central Government, and, therefore, section 3 of the Act was invalid;

(5) In any event, the delegation made by section 3 of the Act was excessive and, therefore, section 3 should be struck down; and

(6) The Punjab Government has no authority to institute these proceedings under the Rules.

3. Re. 1, 2 & 3.

4. These three points may conveniently be taken together. Article 392 provides that "the President may, for the purpose of removing any difficulties, particularly in relation to the transition from the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935, to the provisions of this Constitution, by order direct that this Constitution shall, during such period as may be specified in the order, have effect subject to such adaptations, whether by way of modification, addition or omission, as he may deem to be necessary or expedient; provided that no such order shall be made after the first meeting of Parliament duly constituted under Chapter II of Part V". The purpose of this provision is obvious from the very words in which it was made, Further Article 379 provided that "until both Houses of Parliament have been duly constituted and summoned to meet for the first session under the provisions of this Constitution, the body functioning as the Constituent Assembly of the Dominion of India immediately before the commencement of this Constitution shall be the provisional Parliament and shall exercise all the powers and perform all the duties conferred by the provisions of this Constitution on Parliament". As there was only one House during the transitional period, there were bound to be difficulties in the application of the Constitution, which envisaged a bicameral legislature. Consequently, the president passed the Constitution (Removal of Difficulties) Order No. II on January 26, 1950, by which among other adaptations, he made an adaptation in Article 312 also, to this effect :-

"In clause (1), omit 'if the Council of States has declared by resolution supported by not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting that it is necessary or expedient in the national interest so to do'."

5. This order was to come into force at once and was to continue until both Houses of Parliament had been duly constituted and summoned to meet for the first session under the provisions of the Constitution. After removal of the omitted words, Article 312 read as follows :-

"(1) Notwithstanding anything in Part XI, Parliament may by law provide for the creation of one or more all-India services common to the Union and the States, and subject to the other provisions of this Chapter, regulate the recruitment, and the conditions of service of persons appointed, to any such service.

(2) The services known at the commencement of this Constitution as the Indian Administrative Service and the Indian police service shall be deemed to be services created by Parliament under this article."

6. It is urged the though the President undoubtedly had power to make adaptations, he exceeded that power inasmuch as he omitted the words mentioned above from Article 312 altogether. It is suggested that the adaptation would have been proper, if in Article 312, as it originally stood in the Constitution, the words "Council of States" had been substituted by the words "provisional Parliament", so that instead of a resolution of the Council of States a resolution of the provisional Parliament would have been necessary for the creation and regulation of recruitment and conditions of service of an all-India service common to the Union and the States. Reliance in this connection is placed on Sri Sankari Prasad Singh Deo Vs. Union of India (UOI) and State of Bihar, , where dealing with an adaptation made in Article 368, by the same order, this Court observed that "the adaptation leaves the requirement of a special majority untouched". It is urged that if the President had made the adaptation in the way suggested by learned counsel that would have left the requirement of a resolution supported by requisite majority untouched and would have been within the power of the President; but inasmuch as the entire portion was omitted the President had exceeded his power. It is enough to say that Sri Sankari Prasad Singh Deo Vs. Union of India (UOI) and State of Bihar, , does not lay down that if the adaptation in Article 368 had been made in some other manner it would have been invalid and unconstitutional. Reference to the fact that adaptation left the requirement of a special majority untouched was made obviously for the purpose of emphasising that there was no real ground of grievance and not for indicating that in the absence of the retention of that provision the adaptation would have been bad. Indeed, it was pointed out in that case that Article 392 was widely expressed and an order could be made under that Article for the purpose of removing any difficulties. The nature of the adaptation to be made is also equally widely expressed and it may be by way of modification, addition or omission. In the case of Article 368 the President thought it necessary or expedient that the adaptation should be by modification. In the case of Article 312, however, he thought it necessary or expedient that the adaptation should be by way of omission of certain words from that Article. The power given to the President under Article 392 was very wide and it cannot be said that he could make the adaptation in one way and not in another. It was left to him to consider whether the adaptation should be by way of modification, addition or omission; and if he thought it necessary or expedient with respect to a particular Article that adaptation should be by way of omission it cannot be said that he had exceeded his power. We are, therefore, of opinion that the Act cannot be declared unconstitutional on the ground that the President had exceeded his power under Article 392 and that if he had not done so a resolution of the provisional Parliament would have been necessary with the requisite majority before any law could be undertaken to regulate the recruitment and the conditions of service of an all-India service.

7. Once it is held that the adaptation made by the President in Article 312 was within his power, there is very little left in the other two points raised by Mr. Chatterjee. It is said that the provisional Parliament was not competent to pass the Act in 1951, because the condition precedent for passing such a law had not been, as required by Article 312, complied with. This means in other words that a resolution with the requisite majority had not been passed by the provisional Parliament; but this condition would not be there once those words were validly removed by the order of the President under Article 392, and the provisional Parliament would have power to pass the Act without any resolution being passed before the law was made.

8. The further argument that the Rules were promulgated in 1955 when the words omitted by the Constitution (Removal of Difficulties) Order No. II had reappeared in Article 312 and were, therefore, repugnant to Article 321 inasmuch as there was no resolution of the Council of States, as required by that Article, is, in our opinion, completely baseless. The reappearance of these words in Article 312 has nothing to do with the vires of the Rules. The rules were framed under the power given to the Central Government by the Act, and if the Act was valid when it was passed, the Central Government would have power to frame rules under it, as it is a permanent measure. The Rules framed in 1955, therefore, cannot be challenged on the ground that the omitted words reappeared in Article 312. The Rules derive their force from the Act and the form in which Article 312 emerged, after the Constitution (Removal of Difficulties) Order No. II came to an end in 1952, would not have any effect on Rules. There is no force, therefore, in any of these three points, and we reject them.

9. Re. 4.

9. It is contended that Article 312 lays down a mandate on Parliament to make the law itself regulating the recruitment and the conditions of service of all-India services, and therefore, it was not open to Parliament to delegate any part of the work relating to such regulation to the Central Government by framing Rules for the purpose. Now, it is well settled that it is competent for the legislature to delegate to other authorities the power to frame rules to carry out the purpose of the law made by it. It was so held by the majority of Judges In Re: The Delhi Laws Act, 1912, the Ajmer-Merwara (Extension of Laws) Act, 1947 and the Part C States (Laws) Act, 1950, . The Delhi Laws case was further examined in Rajnarain Singh Vs. The Chairman, Patna Administration Committee, Patna and Another, , and the delegation was held to go to the extent of authorising an executive authority to modify the law made but not in any essential feature. It was also observed that what constitutes essential feature cannot be enunciated in general terms. It is, therefore, clear that delegation of legislative functions can be made to executive authorities within certain limits. In this case section 3 of the Act lays down that the Central Government may, after consultation with the Governments of the States concerned, make rules for the regulation of recruitment and conditions of service of persons appointed to an all-India service. It also lays down that all rules made under this section shall be laid for not less than fourteen days before Parliament as soon as possible after they are made, and shall be subject to such modifications, whether by way of repeal or amendment, as Parliament may make on a motion made during the session in which they are so laid. Mr. Chatterjee contends that no delegation whatsoever was possible under Article 312 and that the Constitution required that Parliament should itself frame the entire law relating to the regulation of recruitment and the conditions of service of all-India services. We have, therefore, to see whether there is anything in the words of Article 312 which takes away the usual power of delegation, which ordinarily resides in the legislature. Stress in this connection has been laid on the words "Parliament may by law provide" appearing in Article 312. It is urged that these words should be read to mean that there is no scope for delegation in a law made under Article 312. Our attention in this connection was drawn to words used in Article 245, which are "Parliament may make laws". It is said that the words used in Article 312 are in a special form, which import that Parliament must provide by law for regulation of recruitment and the conditions of service and cannot delegate any part of it to other authorities. Reference was also made to the words used in Article 138, (namely, Parliament may by law confer); Article 138(2), (namely, Parliament may by law provide); Article 139, (namely, Parliament may by law confer); and Article 148, (namely, as may be determined by Parliament by law). In contrast to these Articles, our attention was drawn to the words of Article 173(c), (namely, by or under any law made by Parliament), and Article 293(2), (namely, by or under any law made by Parliament). It is urged that when the Constitution uses the words "may by law confer" or "may by law provide", no delegation whatsoever is possible. We are of opinion that these words do not necessarily exclude delegation and it will have to be seen in each case how far the intention of the Constitution was that the entire provision should be made by law without recourse to any rules framed under the power of delegation. Let us, therefore, examine Article 312 from this angle, and see if the intention of the Constitution was that regulation of recruitment and conditions of service to an all-India service should only be by law and there should be no delegation of any power to frame rules. Regulation of recruitment and conditions of service requires numerous and varied rules, which may have to be changed from time to time as the exigencies of public service require. This could not be unknown to the Constitution makers and it is not possible to hold that the intention of the Constitution was that these numerous and varied rules should be framed by Parliament itself and that any amendment of these rules which may be required to meet the difficulties of day-to-day administration should also be made by Parliament only with all the attending delay which passing of legislation entails. We are, therefore, of opinion that in the circumstances of Article 312 it could not have been the intention of the Constitution that the numerous and varied provisions that have to be made in order to regulate the recruitment and the conditions of service of all-India services should all be enacted as statute law and nothing should be delegated to the executive authorities. In the circumstances we are of opinion that the words used in Article 312 in the context in which they have been used do not exclude the delegation of power to frame rules for regulation of recruitment and the conditions of service of all-India services. We cannot read Article 312 as laying down a mandate prohibiting Parliament from delegating authority to the Central Government to frame rules for the recruitment and the conditions of service of all-India services. We, therefore, reject this contention.

10. Re. 5.

11. The argument in this connection is that even if delegation is possible, there was excessive delegation in this case, and, therefore, the Act should be struck down. The Act is a short Act of four sections. The first section deals with the short title, the second section defines the expression "all-India Service", and the third section gives power to the Central Government to frame rules for regulation of recruitment and the conditions of service after consultation with the Governments of the States concerned, and lays down that all rules so framed shall be laid before Parliament and shall be subject to such modifications as Parliament may make. Section 4 which is important is in these terms -

"All rules in force immediately before the commencement of this Act and applicable to an all-India service shall continue to be in force and shall be deemed to be rules made under this Act."

12. It is urged that this Act lays down no legislative policy or standard at all and everything is left to the Central Government. In this connection reference was made to the following observations of Mukherjea, J. (as he was then), In Re: The Delhi Laws Act, 1912, the Ajmer-Merwara (Extension of Laws) Act, 1947 and the Part C States (Laws) Act, 1950, :-

"The essential legislative function consists in the determination or choosing of the legislative policy and of formally enacting that policy into a binding rule of conduct. It is open to the legislature to formulate the policy as broadly and with as little or as much details as it thinks proper and it may delegate the rest of the legislative work to a subordinate authority who will work out the details within the framework of that policy. 'So long as a policy is laid down and a standard established by statute no constitutional delegation of legislative power is involved in leaving to selected instrumentalities the making of subordinate rules within prescribed limits and the determination of facts to which the legislation is to apply'."

13. It is said that in this case Parliament did not even exercise the essential legislative function inasmuch as it did not determine or choose the legislative policy and formally enact that policy into a binding rule of conduct. Apparently, if one looks at the Act, there seems to be some force in this contention. But a close reading of section 4 of the Act and its scope, purpose and effect will show that this is not a case where the legislature has failed to lay down the legislative policy and formally to enact that policy into a binding rule of conduct. What does section 4 in fact provide ? Undoubtedly there were rules in force immediately before the commencement of the Act which governed the two all-India services covered by it and the legislature adopted those rules and said in section 4 that they shall continue to be in force. Thus though section 4 appears on the face of it as one short section of four lines, it is in effect a statutory provision adopting all the rules which were in force at the commencement of the Act, governing the recruitment and the conditions of service of the two all-India services. The section certainly lays down that the rules already in force shall be taken to be rules under the Act; but that was necessary in order to enable the Central Government u/s 3 to add to, alter, vary and amend those rules. There is no doubt, however, that section 4 did lay down that the existing rules will govern the two all-India services in the matter of regulation of recruitment and conditions of service, and in so far as it did so it determined the legislative policy and set up a standard for the Central Government to follow and formally enacted it into a binding rule of conduct. Further, by section 3 the Central Government was given the power to frame rules in future which may have the effect of adding to, altering, varying or amending the rules accepted u/s 4 as binding. Seeing that the rules would govern the all-India services common to the Central Government and the State Government provision was made by section 3 that rules should be framed only after consulting the State Governments. At the same time Parliament took care to see that these rules were laid on the table of Parliament for fourteen days before they were to come into force and they were subject to modification, whether by way of repeal or amendment on a motion made by Parliament during the session in which they are so laid. This makes it perfectly clear that Parliament has in no way abdicated its authority, but is keeping strict vigilance and control over its delegate. Therefore, reading section 4 along with section 3(2) of the Act it cannot be said in the special circumstances of this case that there was excessive delegation to the Central Government by section 3(1). We are, therefore, of opinion that the Act cannot be struck down on the ground of excessive delegation.

14. Re. 6.

15. The last contention is that the Punjab Government has no authority to institute these proceedings under the Rules. It would be necessary in this connection to refer to the Rules. Rule 3 provides for penalties, which are seven in number. Rule 4 provides for the authorities, who can impose the penalties, and three of the penalties, namely, dismissal, removal or compulsory retirement, can only be imposed by the Central Government, while the other four penalties can be imposed by the State Government. Rule 5 provides the procedure for imposing penalties. The argument is that as in this case the charge against the appellant is serious, he is likely to be dismissed or removed or compulsorily retired, and therefore, the Central Government should have instituted enquiry in this case. We are of opinion that there is no force in this contention. In the first place, it cannot be postulated at the very outset of the enquiry whether there would be any punishment at all, and even if there is going to be punishment, what particular punishment out of the seven mentioned in rule 3 would be imposed. Therefore, even on the assumption that the Government which has to impose the punishment must also institute the enquiry, it cannot be said at this stage that the Punjab Government which can impose at least four out of seven penalties is not the proper Government to institute the enquiry. In the second place, a perusal of rule 5 shows that the intention is that the enquiry would be instituted by the Government under which the officer is serving even in cases where the penalty is to be imposed by the Central Government. Rule 4(2) shows that so far as the four penalties which could be imposed by the State Government are concerned, the institution of the enquiry is by the Government under whom such officer was serving at the time of commission of such act or omission which renders him liable to punishment. Rule 2(b) defines "Government", and the third clause thereof lays down that in the case of a member of service serving in connection with the affairs of a State, the Government would be the Government of that State. The appellant was serving in connection with the affairs of the State of Punjab, and in his case therefore the Government for the purpose of rule 5 which provides procedure for imposing penalties would be the Punjab Government. It is the Punjab Government, therefore, which could take the steps provided in rule 5. Rules 5(1) to 5(8) provide the procedure for such enquiries and the word "government" used in these sub-rules means in the present case, the Punjab Government, for the appellant was serving in connection with the affairs of the State of Punjab. Rule 5(9) provides for what is to happen after the enquiry is over, and it lays down that after the enquiry has been completed and after the punishing authority has arrived at a provisional conclusion in regard to the penalty to be imposed, if the penalty proposed is dismissal, removal, compulsory retirement or reduction in rank, the member of the service charged shall be supplied with a copy of the report of enquiry and be given a further opportunity to show cause why the proposed penalty should not be imposed on him. The very fact that in this rule the word 'Government' is not used and instead the words 'punishing authority' are used shows that the question of punishment arises after the enquiry is over and the relevant Government would then consider that question; and if punishment is to be one of the three provided in rule 4(1) the report of the enquiry officer would have to be forwarded to the Central Government so that it may determine the provisional punishment and communicate it to the officer concerned along with the report of the enquiry officer to comply with the provisions of Article 311(2). So far as the institution of the enquiry is concerned, rule 5 contemplates that it will be instituted by the Government of the State in connection with the affairs of which the officer is serving. In this case the appellant was serving in connection with the affairs of the State of Punjab, and, therefore, the Punjab Government would have authority to institute the enquiry against him. The Central Government would only come into the picture after the enquiry is concluded and if it is decided to impose one of the three punishments mentioned in rule 4(1). This contention must also be rejected.

16. We, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs to the State of Punjab.

17. Appeal dismissed.